recaptcha

It is an improved captcha version. In principle I used two test texts, one is the traditional one, distorted so that it can only be recognized by one person, but the second is not a test but a collaboration, a word that OCR book digitization services do not recognize and offer it for people who use a captcha to decipher them; for if the first is correct it can be assumed that the latter is also correct. This is not really a validation method, it only took advantage of one to collaborate with the creation of digital books, so later it did include other interactions such as following the movement of a pointer or the historical behavior of a user on the network.

rechincar los dientes

In principle, it is an error, because it is not a locution and is not consulted in dictionaries; but also because there is a word that looks misspelled. One associates it with the phrase "grind your teeth", which is perfectly understood by the meaning of the verb and the noun (and which is neatly described in this same motto by colleague Danilo Enrique Noreña Benítez), but to me 'rechincar' (which officially does not exist) sounds like a localism that brings together two voices: chinar ("to sound two or more Chinese, marbles or balls by friction") and lashing ("crumble a food by squeezing tightly with the teeth") added to the prefix re- (as an intensifier), which together with 'the teeth' seems to have a little more sense for . . . There is an uncommon Spanglish usage for 'remembering' such as 'recording or recording', which obviously comes from record ("record").

But surely it is a dictionary error and they are consulting for catalan/recuita ("tempered, annealed").

Programming the expression " 34 recursion; When an operation is repeated several times within the same sentence. Is " calls same " and it repeats until it finds a boundary.

recursivo

That it repeats itself in all or part of its structure or its rules. Also when something reiterates or contains one or more elements of the same type.
